This book is meant to be written in. Write in your own alphabet. Spell it the way you say it.

Series: Words to Keep

If you're giving this book

Four things that make the difference between a book that fills up and one that doesn't.

1. Fill in the next page before you wrap it. Say which language, and why you want it kept.
2. At the end of most parts there's a page called A question from your family. Write on each one a word you half-remember and want back.
3. Ask them, out loud, the first time you're together: "What did your mother call you when you were in trouble?" Write the answer on the spot, in the book.
4. Read it back to them, badly. Being corrected is half the point.

This book was given to

BY

ON

Because

If you bought this book for yourself:

This book belongs to

The words are yours.

Someone gave you this book because there are words only you still say. The thing your mother shouted from the kitchen. The name for the soft part of the bread. The song you sang without knowing you were singing. The word that means "I'm tired, but happy, and a little sad, and it's evening," that has no English.

They've heard you say these things their whole lives. They can't say them back. In a generation, nobody will.

This book is for those words. Not the language, all of it. Just the part that lived in your house.

Write them the way you say them. Spell them however you like, in whichever alphabet you like. Put the meaning underneath, and when you said it, and who said it best. There's a line on every entry for the person learning it to write how it sounds to them. Let them. Correct them. That's the whole exercise.

Start with your name.

How to use this book

Any language. Any alphabet. Any spelling, as long as it's how you say it.

Two words to a page, in Part Two. Fifty-two in all. If you have more, there's an index at the back with room to keep going.

Every entry has a line for the person learning the word to write how it sounds to them. It will be wrong. Leave it. Write the right way underneath.

Where the book says mother, father, or home, it means whoever and wherever that was for you.

Write in pen. Cross things out. The mistakes are part of the record.

If writing is hard, say the word and let someone write it. Or record it on a phone and write on the page where the recording is kept. The sound of you saying it is the thing.

The rules

There aren't any, except these:

If you're not sure how to spell it, spell it how you say it.

If it's rude, it counts. Especially if it's rude.

If it's a word your family made up, it counts more.

If you can't remember the word but you remember when it was said, write that.

PART ONE

How to say my name

Every word in this book starts here. The name you were given, the name they called you, and the way your name changed when it crossed over.

Then the names of the people you're writing this for, the way you say them.

My name

WRITTEN, THE WAY IT'S WRITTEN AT HOME

SAID, THE WAY IT'S SAID AT HOME

WHAT IT MEANS, OR WHO I'M NAMED AFTER

WHAT THEY CALLED ME AS A CHILD

WHAT MY NAME BECAME HERE, AND WHAT I THINK OF THAT

Your names, in my language

For each person this book is for. Their name, and the way I say it.

NAME, AND HOW I SAY IT

NAME, AND HOW I SAY IT

NAME, AND HOW I SAY IT

NAME, AND HOW I SAY IT

WHAT I'D HAVE NAMED YOU, IF IT HAD BEEN UP TO ME

Where the language comes from

THE COUNTRY, THE REGION, THE TOWN

HOW WE SPEAK IT DIFFERENTLY FROM THE REST OF THEM

WHO TAUGHT IT TO ME

WHO I STILL SPEAK IT WITH

[illegible]

Who spoke it to me

MY MOTHER, AND HOW SHE SPOKE

MY FATHER, AND HOW HE SPOKE

THE ONE WHO SPOKE IT MOST BEAUTIFULLY

THE ONE WHO SWORE IN IT

Quick ones

The first word I'd teach a baby.

The word I say without thinking, even in English.

The word I've forgotten and want back.

What we call the television.

What we call a fool, affectionately.

The word for the feeling of coming home.

A question from your family.

Written by the person who gave you this book.

THEIR QUESTION

[illegible]

For a photograph, a drawing, or anything else.

PART TWO

The words we still use

Fifty-two of them, two to a page. Not the whole language. The part that lived in the house.

The word. How to say it. What it means. When we said it, and who said it best. And a line for the one learning it to write how it sounds to them.

Quick ones

The word for the soft part of the bread.

The word for the thing you use to stir.

The word for a person who talks too much.

What we say when someone sneezes.

What we say when a glass breaks.

The word for the last bit of food nobody wants to take.

A question from your family.

Written by the person who gave you this book.

THEIR QUESTION

[illegible]

For a photograph, a drawing, or anything else.

PART THREE

Things my mother shouted from the kitchen

The words that came with a tone. What she called you when you were in trouble. What she said at the door. The blessings, the curses, the jokes that don't survive translation.

These are the ones that go first, because nobody writes them down. Write them down.

What she called us when we were in trouble.

The whole sentence, with the name in it.

[illegible]

What my father said instead.

His words. His tone. The one he saved for special occasions.

The blessings.

Before a meal, before a journey, over a child's head.

The curses. The mild ones.

The ones you can say in front of the children, and what they actually mean.

[illegible]

The jokes that only work in our language.

Tell one anyway, and explain why it's funny. It won't be. That's fine.

[illegible]

A word we have that English doesn't.

Say what it means the long way.

PART FOUR

The songs

The lullaby. The one for parties. The one from the old country that everyone knew and nobody could translate. The hymn, if there was one.

Write the words the way you sang them, wrong words included. The tune is in your head; write the name of it, or who sang it on the radio, so someone can find it.

PART FIVE

The food, by its real name

Nobody in our family ever called it by the English name. Write the real ones, and what we ate on which day, and what we said before and after.

Dishes, and what we called them

PART SIX

Letters, in both languages

Write to them in your language first. Then write it again in English, or as close as you can get. Then leave them room to write back.

The two letters won't match. That's the point.
